WASHINGTON, April 11.--The remains of George T. Frye, Jr., in Executive Mansion, this city, were buried on Monday afternoon. Mr. Frye was one of the most distinguished figures in American politics, and his death is a great loss to the country.

On Thursday evening the remains of George T. Frye, Jr., were removed from the Executive Mansion to the house of his son, who was to attend the funeral. It was a bright and sunny afternoon, and the streets were thronged with people. The body lay in state in the hall of the Executive Mansion until the hour of the funeral. The casket was covered with a black cloth and a Union flag. The service was conducted by the Rev. George B. Ledyard, the President of the University of the District of Columbia.

The funeral cortège proceeded to the house of Mr. Frye's son, where the body was placed in the hearse and conveyed to the grave. The mourners included members of the executive and legislative branches of the government, as well as a large number of friends and acquaintances. The service was conducted by the Rev. George B. Ledyard, the President of the University of the District of Columbia.

The body was placed in the grave and the mourners returned to the Executive Mansion, where a banquet was held in honor of the late Mr. Frye. The guests included members of the executive and legislative branches of the government, as well as a large number of friends and acquaintances.

The weather was fine and the day was pleasant, and the people seemed to be in high spirits as they gathered around the grave to bid farewell to one of America's greatest patriots.
